EVENT DESCRIPTION:	The session started at 10:00. In this last double session, Professor Patricia García Espin from the University of Granada introduced her presentation about Ethnographic research in political science and political sociology: possibilities of contribution and ethical challenges, in the framework of the new Online Training Sessions that have been held from April to June, targeting the Tunisian partners of the PACTUM project together with PhD students and general Junior Academic Staff. The program also included a second session held by Professor Miguel José Arjona Sanchez about From public law to political science: cross-disciplinary collaboration and interdisciplinary work. This double session with the colleagues from the University of Granada had the specific aim to provide

Tunisian PhD students and junior academic staff with new approaches and insights on their research methodology and perspectives to be applied to the topics chosen for their PhD theses. In the first case, Prof. Patricia Garcia Espin focus on the ethnographic studies as possible extension and further perspective, both for research and for the implementation of the PACTUM MA in Social sciences, on contents to which this approach is related.

During the second session, this entire topic will apply to the intersection between Constitutional Law and Political Sciences to offer possible approach to the teaching of both law and political sciences in the PACTUM MA.

The students discussed with the instructors about possible practical ways to make the connection concrete and to transform it into a multidisciplinary approach to study and research.

The session ended at 12.00.

The GMeet sessions were also live recorded and it's available here: <https://pactum-project.eu/>
